the ranks, or in the words of this cor-respondent, "come in at the hawse holes." We might enumerate a long-list of officers who have helped to materially curve out a good deal of the history of this country within the last thirty-five years who were not averse to coming in at these "holes." Why should there be an impossible barrier between the grade of an of-ficer and that of an enlisted man? Would he have all the officers of the army "born to the purple?" In these the ranks, or in the words of this cor-respondent, "come in at the hawse army "born to the purple?" In these peaceful times what chance is there to perform "specially meritorious service?" Cannot a soldier, if he be a vice?" Cannot a soldier, if he be a non-commissioned officer, prove his ability to command men other than by answering questions relative to his studies? The mere fact that a soldier in the ranks is ambitious to climb higher, presupposes some inherent qualifications for the position to which he aspires. He desires a commission. He is in good health, intelligent, hon-

sults his wishes.

This ancient talk about a soldier not being able to work his way up to a commission without a "pull" is losing its force in the light of recent events. That word "pull" is now taking on a new meaning. When you sift it down to the bottom it very often means merit which has been recognized by other meritorious people.
